Glycerin 2.0% w/w

ACTIONS:

Cetrimide is a quaternary ammonium disinfectant with properties and use typical of cationic surfactants. It dissociates in aqueous solution into a relatively large and complex action, which is responsible for the surface activity, and smaller inactive anion. It has bactericidal activity against both Gram-positive and Gram-negative organisms but higher concentration are necessary to kill the later type; they are, however, relatively ineffective against bacterial spores, acid-fast bacterial, viruses, and fungi. Cationic surfactants are most effective in neutral or slightly alkaline solution and their bactericidal activity is appreciable reduced in acid media. Cetrimide is bactericidal to Gram-positive organisms but they are relatively ineffective against some Gram-negative organisms; strains of Pseudomonas aeruginosa are particularly resistant, as are those of Mycobacterium tuberculosis. Bacterial spores are likely to survive even prolonged contact with solutions of these compounds. Some cationic surfactants have good activity against Candida albicans, but antifungal activity is variable.

Externally, glycerin is used for its water-retaining and emollient properties in dermatological preparations. It absorbed moisture from exposed or inflamed tissues and mucous membranes when applied undiluted.
